The problem of high school dropouts is a growing concern – a “national emergency” according to a recent study by the Ford Foundation. Research on the needs of at-risk youth suggests that large, urban high schools are often failing these students. Modeled on the practices of four small, tailor-made high schools, this book provides lessons based what these schools are doing structurally and organizationally to help their students succeed. Specifically, these schools provide effective strategies in three areas: hiring policies, curriculum design, and community partnerships.
